

NEW DISCOVERY – LEWIS M. RHINEHART – THE MINOTAUR

Two horns and a razor grin define a minotaur found by MARS photo-analyst Lewis M. Rhinehart. This large terra-form exemplifies the Martian propensity to craft vast landforms into imaginative works of public art featuring faces of humans, other primates, and animals, especially those that are reptilian and other predatory species. Here, we find the latter characteristic exemplified in the two rows of sharp teeth that line the mouth of what is a mythical creature on Earth but that might exist as a hybrid species on Mars, where hybrids abound. In discovering life – and its evidence – on Mars, we must see Mars as it is and not as we would wish or presuppose it to be. The goal of achieving harmonious relations with Mars will rest on an accurate view of the Martian civilization.

New Discovery – The Minotaur, page 2

The teeth of the Martian minotaur as seen close up.

An elfin form has the minotaur under observation.